

Chaiti Seth, MCD (she/her)

Bio:

Chaiti Seth is a mother, farmer, researcher, and experiential educator from India currently living in Mi'kma'ki. She is a faculty member with the Department of Community Development where she learns, writes, and teaches about sustainable food systems and the inner work and community practice of healing for equity and social change. She lives with her partner and two children in an intentional community on south mountain above Sikunme'katik (the Gaspereau river).

Title:

Moving from abundance: redistribution, dignified access, and culture as responses to hunger

Short Abstract:

Chaiti's talk will highlight local and global examples of community responses to hunger that are rooted in equitable access, sovereignty in food production and consumption, and building sustainable food cultures. It will explore the role of waste reduction, redistribution, dignified community access, and production practices for carbon sequestration and nutrition over yield as community-centric, asset-based approaches to addressing hunger.
